

THE REVOLUTION IN CUBA.

THE map of Cuba on our front page, shows at a glance the territory occupied by the present revolution there, and the recent march of Count Valmaseda from San Miguel to Bayamo, the seat of the insurgent Government. Cuba is divided politically into two departments, and it will be seen that very nearly all of the Eastern department was involved in the insurrection. The population in 1862 was, whites, 773,484; free colored, 232,501; slaves, 372,550; total, 1,376,535; of which two-thirds of each class resided in the Western and one-third in the Eastern department.

Bayamo, the seat of General Cespede's Government, was a large interior town, forty-two miles from Manzanillo, containing about six thousand inhabitants before the revolution broke out. On the recent occupation of the place by General Valmaseda, the insurgents fled to the mountains near the south coast, which are very precipitous, and almost inaccessible to bodies of troops.

Recent advices from Havana indicate that the liberal measures of General Dulce, the new Spanish Captain-General, are having a marked effect in reducing the insurrectionary feeling in Cuba.

Our pictures of Cuban cities, towns, and scenery, are very accurate, and as they were recently sketched, show the present appearance and condition of prominent localities of the island. Trinidad de Cuba, of which we publish a view in this number, is one of the oldest and most pleasant towns on the southern coast, a short distance east from Cienfuegos. It is situated on the hills, three miles from the port, which is called Casilda. Here the tourist, and especially invalids, find a genial residence during the season of the northerners, from which it is much protected by the topographical character of the surrounding country.

The climate is delightful, the inhabitants genial and hospitable, and good accommodations can be had at fair prices. It is the only place in the western part of Cuba where the apple and peach are cultivated. The distance to Casilda is three miles.

---

---