

The Late Expedition for Cuba.

In this morning's HERALD will be found a graphic and interesting description of the late Cuban expedition, which so successfully eluded the vigilance of the United States authorities here and put to sea with a cargo of men, arms and ammunition, intended to aid the Cubans. The article is furnished by the HERALD correspondent who accompanied the expedition to its destination at Fernandina, Florida. Up to his departure all went well, the men were in excellent spirits, and the general feeling among them was a strong desire to meet the foe. Discipline and good order were observable throughout, and there is no reason to doubt that those who compose the expedition will give a good account of themselves should they succeed in effecting a landing on the Cuban coast. Many of the officers are capable and experienced men, and have seen active service. The names of some of the higher officers mentioned in connection with the expedition will be at once recognized, and no fear, either for their courage or ability, need be entertained. Up to this time, however, the news of the successful landing of the men and ammunition on the Cuban ground has not been received, though it is anxiously wished for.
