

The Cuban Revolution Not Yet Ended.

Recent telegrams and mail advices from Cuba establish the fact that the Cuban revolution is not yet terminated. Notwithstanding the recent boastful proclamations of the Spanish generals nothing worth recording has been accomplished. We hear less of Valmaseda and more of Puello of late. Both are said to be good generals, but so far their generalship has been of little account. They have made a show of doing something, and only a show. Armies have been marched into the interior without doing much damage to the insurgents and have returned to rest upon prospective laurels. Campaign after campaign has been planned, inaugurated and closed without accomplishing the slightest victory of any moment over the rebels. The Cubans are forced to pursue a guerilla system of warfare. The reasons for this course are obvious. But what is the immense Spanish army doing all this time? Over forty thousand regulars and about the same number of volunteers, with a powerful naval force, have been engaged in quelling the revolution, and the greatest successes that have been accomplished for the honor of Spain have been in the way of flowery proclamations and brutal butcheries. If proclamations could crush the struggling Cubans they would have been stamped out of existence long since. Seward's sixty day proclamation cannot compare in the slightest degree with some of the effusions of De Rodas, Valmaseda and Puello. Only a short time ago we heard of "numerous engagements between the government troops and the insurgents" near Puerto Principe and the Cinco Villas district. As the particulars of these engagements have only been summed in the killing of forty insurgents it is safe to infer that things have not gone in a way to please the Spaniards. Only a few days ago General Carbo, at the head of a large body of troops, attacked the rebels near Cienfuegos, under Cavada, and was defeated. General Puello, who loudly proclaimed his intentions before entering on the campaign in the Central Department of ending the rebellion in his district, has not accomplished anything as yet. In view of these facts it begins to look very much as if the Cuban revolution is not yet ended.
