

ANOTHER BATTLE IN CUBA.—A special telegram from Havana, by way of Key West, informs us of the successful landing of a Cuban expedition at Nuevas Grandes and a battle at Manati. As Manati is but a short distance from the point where the landing was effected it is probable that a junction had been made between the invading party and a considerable body of the Cobans, and thus consolidated the insurgents gave battle to the Spaniards at the place named. Troops have been forwarded in hot haste from Puerto Principe, via Nuevitas, to the scene of action. The fact of no particulars of the engagement having been received, or, at least, none made public in Havana, looks bad for the Spaniards. They generally make a "big blow" when they accomplish anything. Silence, in this instance, may be regarded as an indication of a Cuban victory.
