

There are 53 Cuban clubs in the United States, all organized for the purpose of assisting in the freeing of Cuba from Spanish rule. These clubs are about to establish a federation, with its headquarters in New York. It is expected Estrada Palma, who fought in the revolution twenty years ago, was captured and held a prisoner in Spain several years, and who afterwards came to this country, and now resides in New Jersey, will be its president.

The object of confederating the clubs is to secure unity of action in aiding the Cuban revolutionists. Estrada Palma will endeavor to establish diplomatic relations with the government. The insurrectionists are anxious to be regarded as belligerents by the powers. The consolidated clubs will be called the Cuban revolutionary party of the United States.
