

JAMES REDPATH'S FUNERAL

HIS BODY IS REMOVED TO FRESH POND, WHERE IT WILL BE CREMATED.

The funeral of James Redpath, the journalist and magazine writer, who died at St. Luke's Hospital on Tuesday from injuries received in being run over by a horse car, took place yesterday morning from the residence of Frederick Weaverson, at No. 242 West Fourteenth street.

The services were conducted by the Rev. Drs. Collyer and McGlynn and the three large parlors of Mr. Weaverson's residence were crowded with members of the Anti-Poverty Society.

The body lay in a plain black casket, and the parlor doors were draped with the American and Irish flags. Dr. Collyer delivered a glowing eulogy on Mr. Redpath's qualities and virtues, and related how Mr. Redpath offered aid to him when his church had been destroyed during the Chicago fire. Dr. McGlynn followed with an address of a similar nature.

The body was then taken to the Fresh Pond (L. L.) Crematory, where it will be reduced to ashes.

Among those present were Robert Belford, Charles F. Wingate, A. S. Packard, Jeremiah Coughlin, Sylvester T. Malone, O'Donovan Rossa, Rossiter Johnson, James F. Coughlin and Captain Codman.
