Trouble In Cuba

Revolutionists Here

Disunited By Feuds

There are enough Cuban revolutionaries in the Miami area to start a war among themselves, and from time to time it has looked as if that very thing might happen.

Take the forces of Fidel Castro, the man who gives Cuban President Fulgencio Batista fits by running a rebel stronghold in Cuba's mountains. Castro's Miami supporters are split into two groups. One 26th of July organization is headed by Juan Cheda, of 3527 NW 2nd St. The other 26th of July group is run by J. W. Paula, a restaurateur.

Much Bickering

There has been much bickering between the two groups as to which really represents Castro, but the Cheda organization seems to have triumphed. Castro's sisters, Lida and Emma, tried to bring peace to the feuding factions, but ended up siding with Cheda's organization.

In addition, there is feuding between those backing Castro's revolutionary movement and Carlos Prio Socarras, former president of Cuba and the prime anti-Batista force until Castro launched his spectacular foray on Cuba last December.

Only last week when the Castro sisters staged a rally at the Flager Theater in downtown Miami a Castro supporter got up on the stage and denounced all past regimes in Cuba—which naturally included that of Prio's.

When he started his tirade, the Prio supporters got up and walked out of the meeting.

Leads Up Blind Alley

Two of those who walked out were Eva Guitierrez, whose husband was killed recently in Cuba, and Joachim Ferrer, who lost two sons and a nephew in the fighting. They were key figures at the rally and also key figures in the recent anti-Batista demonstration in downtown Miami in which 100 Cubans clashed with police in a wild March on the Cuban consulate.

The calmer forces in the anti-Batista movement realize that bickering and feuding between the various groups opposing Batista leads up a blind alley.

"At this very moment, arrangements are being made between Prio's forces, Castro's and the anti-Batista organizations and the Directorio Estudiantil (student movement) for a "unity" meeting in Miami this week. They will try to work out all their differences at the meeting and present a solid front to the outside."

Besides the direct overthrow of Batista's government, the main objectives of all three groups today is to influence opinion both here and in Cuba.

"The American people are beginning to swing to our side," said Jose Alaman, wealthy young Cuban exile and a director of the student group. "They realize we are right."

that Batista ran for the presidency in 1940 on a coalition ticket that included the Communist party. They brand him as murderer and torturer. What do Batista's men have to say about these charges? Hernandez, Cuba's consul-general in Miami, says he finds the charges of the revolutionaries incredible.

"They call President Batista murderer and torturer," said Hernandez. "But the men saying these things are murderers themselves. They have been in Cuba and are now being persecuted by the government. They are constantly going in and out of Cuba and nobody bothers them, although we know precisely what they are doing."

Hernandez said he found the various protest meetings held in Miami equally incomprehensible. "Not only the Consulate saying Batista has murdered their sons and husbands."

"Do you really believe those people were killed?"

Willing To Forget

They were part of an extradition force trained in the Dominican Republic and lauded from Miami to join the recognized and established government of Cuba.

"Cuban soldiers fight for their country, the Cuban people," Hernandez added. "The Cuban people are willing to forget the deeds of their past.

And, Hernandez added, the government is willing to forget the crimes of all the revolutionists if they will simply stop the bombings and resistance going on in Cuba today and recognize the elections slated for next year.

The dissuasion which marks the resistance groups in Miami follows the pattern of party politics in Cuba, said Hernandez.

"The real trouble in Cuba is intelligence," he said. "We need more men to be leaders."

Citing the Orthodox Party as an example, Hernandez explained that it has split into so many divisions, stemmed originally from the Autenticos Party.

Although the students do not have a political party, they are most active in politics. Castro got his start as a student leader, becoming president of FEU, the national federation of students.

The Directorio Estudiantil, or student directory, represents the violent element of the students who allied with Castro, said Hernandez.

"If you hear of students robbing the banks in Havana," said Hernandez, "you must remember that there are 15,000 students at the University of Havana. Only 150 or so partake in the rioting. The rest don't believe in such measures."

Cites Batista Gains

Hernandez said that Batista is not a dictator as his opponents claim, having been elected to office in 1952.

He said that when Batista took over in a well-planned coup in 1952 he did so to maintain order and preserve the integrity of Cuba.

"Since he has been in office Cuba has enjoyed prosperity," he said. "Many roads and public works have been built during his regime than during any other administration."

"The Cuban people know that."

To confuse matters further, the Orthodox Party, which has split into so many divisions, stemmed originally from the Autenticos Party.
