At the conclusion Mr. Rowe, a gallant soldier, who lost one of his legs in the war, made a telling speech against the Radical Congress, and more especially its head, Thad. Stephens, and his tail, Eggleston and Hays. He called upon all sound Union men to unite in the efforts of President Johnson in his great and noble efforts to preserve the Union, for the preservation of which so many thousand brave men shed their blood on the fields of battle. The speech was received with great enthusiasm, and the meeting adjourned, to meet again on Monday evening, to choose delegates for the Convention.
