- f. Personal characteristics:

Quevedo is a small, dark, middle-aged Latin who is much impressed by his own importance. He abounds in energy and is a definite extrovert. He tackles any task with complete confidence that he is the most capable man for the position. He has a natural tendency towards being lazy, but his desires for material gain and personal importance nullify his lazy tendencies and drive him unmercifully. He has a very pleasing personality and has many casual friends but few good friends. He is well known throughout Cuba and is generally liked for his hearty good fellowship. Quevedo has a quick mind, is a crafty horsetrader, makes a good first impression, is treacherous in business deals if such action benefits him and knows Cuban politics thoroughly. He appears to have no political affiliations, but he champions any political party that happens to be in power. He is a superior publicity man, but only a fair administrator. This cocky and able "latino" always does things on a grand scale.

- i. He definitely states that he has no political affiliations and that he is rabidly anti-communist. He actually pays lip service to any political group in power in Cuba in order to achieve his own personal ends.
- j. Although the greater part of his education was acquired in the United States and he speaks English very fluently, Quevedo has a tendency to be anti-United States. This anti-United States attitude is probably a direct reaction of his jealousy of the power and ability of the United States. This attitude is not pronounced, but would become so if it best suited Quevedo's personal gain. Quevedo feels that Cubans have to kowtow too much to the United States.
