JOE BROWN,

ROBT. FULLER.

Sworn to before me, January 27th, 1857. R. E. Stillwell, U. S. Commissioner.

Sundry other affidavits were also made, which have not yet transpired, and thereupon a number of warrants were placed in the hands of the United States Deputy Marshal.

This morning Deputy Marshal J. Thompson proceeded to the Mansion House in Chambers street, and arrested ex-Consul J. W. Fabens while he was eating his breakfast, and took him immediately before Commissioner Stillwell, who required him to give bail in $3,000 for violation of the neutrality laws. Col. Fabens states that he is "First Director of the Colonization Society for the Republic of Nicaragua," appointed in 1855 by Don Patricia Rivas, and declined to give bail. He is spending the day in the custody of Marshal Hillyer. He also says that he is largely interested with Major Heiss in mines in Chantales.

Marshals Thompson, De Angelis, Horton, and Mangles then (ten o'clock A. M.) paid a visit to the steamer Tennessee, at the foot of Ninth street, East river, which had been expected to sail this forenoon with a large number of "emigrants," alias recruits, for Walker. They found the steamer not quite ready to sail, her repairs not being completed. There were about two hundred "emigrants" on board, some dressed in partial uniform, others in seedy civil garb, a few carrying rusty sabres and other weapons of war in their hands, and nearly all engaged in smoking vile cigars.

About the time the officers arrived men were at work getting on board large boxes, trunks, &c. Among the boxes our reporter noticed several marked "cartridge boxes" and "U. S. army at Springfield." These were being hurried below as rapidly as possible. In the first and second cabins were promiscuous crowds of men, women, children, boxes, bedding, &c. huddled together among the berths and bunks, while on deck many tender scenes of parting were being enacted, although the firemen had not yet got the steam up.

The officers took up a position near the gangway and closely scrutinized the faces of those who came on board, now and then picking out men and standing them in a row a little in the background. The victims selected all displayed the utmost nonchalance, ridiculing the idea that peaceable men like themselves could be suspected of a violation of the neutrality laws, and calling attention to the large number of ladies on board (among whom, by the way, is the wife of Major Henningsen) as proof of the peaceable character of the emigration.

The names of the parties arrested, as near as we could learn, are as follows: Capt Henry Bolton, clerk in the "colonization office" at the corner of Broadway and Leonard streets. Col. George B. Hall. Alexander C. Lawrence, keeper of the St. Charles hotel. Andrew Finigan, workman on the Harlem railroad, who was about to leave a wife and three children. The prisoners were all taken before the marshal and held for examination.
