

FROM KANZAS The Intelligencer says. Dates of the 19th, from the border, give the particulars of the last days of the war in Kansas, and circumstances attending the final treaty of peace at Franklin.

The Missourians, true to their word, marched from Westport to attack Lawrence on the 13th. The army was composed of one regiment of foot and two of mounted men, in all 2100 men, attended by four pieces of artillery.

Gen Haskell was in command.

On the 13th and 14th the army marched 40 miles, reaching Franklin 3 miles from Lawrence.

When about 4 miles from Franklin, the advance guard was fired on by the pocket guard of the Lawrence army, and one man killed.

The main body was hurried up as fast as possible, for the purpose of attacking Lawrence that evening.

By the time it reached Franklin, however, it was night, and the contemplated attack was postponed.

The army encamped at Franklin, intending to make the assault next day, the 15th.

At midnight, however, an express arrived in camp, with the information that Col Cook, with a large force of U. S. troops, had taken up a position in front of Lawrence, for the purpose of protecting it from the proposed attack.

Col Cook communicated notice of his resolution to defend the town, in a note to Gen Haskell, warning him of the consequences.

It was said that Col Cook had been sent by Gov. Geary to protect Lawrence.

On the 15th Governor Geary arrived at Franklin, and had a consultation with the officers of the invading army.

He told them that he was prepared to enforce the laws; to arrest offenders; to crush insurrection, and to suppress disorder with the assistance of the troops under his command, and that the interposition of the Missourians was no longer necessary.

As an evidence of his ability to enforce the laws, he told them he had just arrested 90 or 100 outlaws, who would be tried by the legal authorities.

In view of these facts, the Governor urged the Missourians to disband, and abandon their projected attack on Lawrence.

Gen Atchison, Gen Reid, and Col Titus, addressed the meeting and urged compliance with the Governor's proposal.

The Governor then withdrew from the conference to afford the Missourians an opportunity to act among themselves on his suggestion.

A meeting was instantly organized by calling Gen Atchison to the chair.

Resolutions were passed, declaring that, relying on the protection promised to peaceable settlers by the Governor, they the invading army, would now disband and return to their homes; request the Governor to distribute over the territory a militia, to protect the settlers from marauders and robbers and recommending that Col Titus be made commander of the militia of the Territory.

The Missourians then broke up camp and returned home, except those who intended to settle in the territory.

The 90 or 100 men arrested by Governor Geary belonged to the company of Col. Harvey, who made the attack on Capt. Robertson.
