

SOUTHERN INTERFERENCE IN KANSAS.—In the Anderson Gazette and Advocate of the 22d, (a South Carolina paper) is a singular correspondence in relation to Kansas affairs. Mr. Warren D. Wilkes, late adjutant general of the Northern division of Kansas militia, gives ill health as his reason for returning home, for, in consequence, it seems he was suspected of not being "sound on the goose." But he says:—

I am here now, conscious that I have been true to myself and to the South. Here, around the altars of South Carolina, whose institutions and people suit me best, I intend to linger just so long as I please, and I challenge those of her sons who are disposed to blame me for returning to her bosom, to go seventeen hundred miles and do and dare for her as I have done, or failing to do that, to join a company with me to strike the first, the boldest and the latest blow for Southern rights."

Th's Adjutant General was also a publisher of a paper, and expended a considerable amount of funds in his two-fold capacity. He explains all, however, as follows:—

Public and private funds, I received the sum of $5,320 53; and I hold in my hands receipts, duly signed, and accounts for that amount, with exception of $367, which I retain to cover my expenses in canvassing the South. And of that sum I spent the greater part for the pro slavery party.

South Carolina thus sent an adjutant general, a printer, and $5,320 53 to the war.
