

It would seem as if the Cuban insurrection was fast assuming the proportions of a revolution, and that Cuban independence in the near future may be no unlikely event. Spanish troops are being sent over to assist in quelling the revolt, but still the insurgents gain ground in spite of the official declarations of their submission. The Cubans are but following the example of their Spanish rulers in rebelling against an unpopular government, and there is but little consistency in the Spanish revolutionary government sending troops to put down a movement similar to their own. But Cuba is fast hastening to the fulfilment of its "manifest destiny."