

SUGAR. Up to April 1st, there was no "new sugar" in Montpelier, where, if anywhere, it might be looked for. And it is now too late to expect anything but an indifferent "run," saying nothing of the snow blockade in the woods. We notice that the excitement in the sugar market, supposed to have sprung from the Cuban insurrection, has subsided, and sugars have receded again. The prospect of increased production in some of our gulf states has probably had some effect in favor of the consumers.
