

OUR CASE IN CUBA.—When Mexico was recently all at sea with regard to government we plainly indicated our hostility to the re-establishment of monarchy so near to us. In Cuba the case is substantially the same. In common with the Spanish people the Cuban people have thrown down the Bourbon domination, and while in Spain the people deliberate whether they will choose a republican or other form of government, it is for us to guarantee to our neighbors the same right of choice and to see that European monarchies gain no new power here. This is the Moproc doctrine. These are American ideas. This doctrine and these ideas must be asserted at the Spanish capital by a man fresh from the American people.
