

THE CUBAN FAIR.

The ladies who have organized the fair for the benefit of the sick and wounded of the patriotic army of Cuba have removed their stalls and the articles which they have for sale to a smaller room at Apollo Hall, at the corner of Twenty-eighth street and Broadway. Although a large number of the handsome articles offered for sale at the commencement of the fair have been disposed of, there yet remains a large number of useful and ornamental things to be sold. The very handsome case of diamonds and jewels, valued at $10,000, still remains on hand; and it has been determined to raffle this off, a very large number of the chances having already been taken, but a few still remaining to purchasers. Another set of jewelry, including brooch, bracelet and earrings, is also offered for raffle at two dollars a chance. Last night the beautiful ladies of the junta who have the fair in hand were all busy using their most powerful solicitations to persuade their visitors to invest their money in the articles, useful and ornamental, which still remained for sale, and it must be encouraging to the ladies to know that in many instances they succeeded in their laudable endeavors. A large number of valuable articles still remain for sale, and it is the sincere wish of the saleswomen that they should be disposed of during the present week. The ladies have entered into this work with heart and soul, devoting time and money to the worthy enterprise, and it will be a shame if those anxious for the freedom of Cuba do not do their utmost to assist the patriotic ladies in their endeavors to raise money for the sick and wounded of the patriotic Cuban army. The fair, it is expected, will close this week, and unless some new visitors show themselves at the fair it is expected that many of the articles will remain on hand. The managers have already sent on a large sum to help those in whose interest it was started, but the amount, it is said, is not so large as their sanguine hopes led them to anticipate. As the fair will remain open for some days longer those anxious to help the cause of Cuba will have an opportunity still presented for showing their sympathy in a substantial manner.
