Our correspondence from Havans, publiked elsewhere, reports that rumors were correct to the effect that Captain General de Rodas had received a telegram from Madrid instructing him to "prepare the country for a change in the government." It was also reported that, evidently in connection with such instruction, the archives were being secretly carried to the Cabanas fortress. What object there would be in secreey is not so clear. Our correspondent, though inclined to doubt these rumors, states that the Spanlards are growing tired of the war and are becoming desirous for peace on the basis of the autonomy of Caba. Like the betting man who has staked his money and afterwards perceives an almost certainty of losing, they are inclined to "hedge" and thus save themselves from the consequences of Cuban independence. Mean-time our incluligence from the interior of the Island tells only of ruin and devastation, with fighting of the most desultory character. No engagements of consequence had taken place, nor were any likely to occur. On the whole, though, the insurgents had not only maintained their positions, but had been aided by two or three expeditions which successfully landed men, arms and munitions of war.
