

Views of a Senatorial Organ on Non-Interference by England and France.

[From the Providence Journal (Senator Anthony's organ), Sept. 22.]

The telegraph informs us that the governments of England and France have decided that there shall be no interference from that side of the water, between the United States and Spain in regard to Cuba. This is a sensible conclusion. The Cuban question is an American question. France and England have no more legitimate concern in it than we have in the Eastern question; and their interposition could be explained on no other ground than a jealousy of the aggrandizement of the American republic. It would arouse a feeling on this side that would be sure to prevent the very purpose which the European Powers would have in making it. Our government has wisely and honestly abstained from interference in Cuban affairs; but if the forbearance which is due to ourselves and to the laws of nations should be construed into deference to the arrogant assumption of foreign Powers, it would not be possible to restrain our people from the violent expression of their sympathies. The decision of the great Powers is wise and just, and will strengthen the administration in the disposition which it has maintained, under so great provocations, not to interfere unnecessarily in the affairs of Cuba.
