The Cuban privateer Hornet is believed to be in Cuban waters looking out for Spanish transports carrying troops or the regular steamers plying between Havana and Cadiz. She is able to fight almost any vessel in the Spanish Navy and is fast enough to get away from the rest.

Havana despatches state that the recent report that General Jordan was negotiating for the surrender of his troops on the payment of a certain sum of money was based upon official information. The insurgents near Yaguajay and Pinar, the nearest troops to the sugar districts of Colon and Cardenas, are also reported treating for surrender.
