

The War in Paraguay.

The latest advices from Paraguay, by way of Lisbon and London, inform us of the victorious achievements of the allied army operating against President Lopez. Previous despatches through the same source spoke of the annihilation of the Paraguayan army at Ascurra, and from these reports we were led to believe that Lopez and his followers were completely used up. Recent developments, however, prove otherwise. The latest news announces that the allied army, commanded by Count d'Eu, attacked the forces of Lopez in their intrenchments surrounding the town of Curuguaty and entirely defeated them. The loss of the Paraguayans is set down at one thousand killed and three hundred prisoners. Lopez, with the remainder of his army, is said to have fled to Ignacion, closely pursued by the victorious army. The provisional government at Asuncion has also declared Lopez an outlaw. Reports received here in relation to the progress of the war in Paraguay smack very much like the news from Cuba about the conduct of the war there. The victory is always for the Spaniards, no matter who wins; thousands of Cubans are killed; loss on the Spanish side trifling. So in Paraguay, Lopez's army has been beaten, scattered, annihilated, dispersed and disbanded so many times that it is almost impossible to keep track of him or his followers. The news published in another column is in many respects similar to previous information from that part of the world, and whether it is false or true remains to be seen.
