The Spanish authorities in Cuba are not only suspected of robbing their mails, but they are also accused of stealing letters directly from the hands of those who post them. This is the charge which reaches us from our Havana correspondent. It seems to us not improbable of one out of that class of bad governments whose traditional practice has been—when wanting a treasury—to steal, and when in search of a policy to open the mail-bag. That way of carrying on government is at least simple.
