Three sticks of dynamite with blasting caps affixed were found at a curb on 1st Ave. and 33d St. yesterday, just half a mile south of the U. N. headquarters. Police said the wiring was "strange," unlike anything construction workers might make up, and they immediately sought a link between the dynamite bomb and the bazooka shell attack on the U. N. during Cuban Industry Minister Che Guevara's speech on Friday. The bazooka was sent to the Picatinny Arsenal in Dover, N. J., for lab analysis.

Meanwhile, police also told a Criminal Court judge that a Cuban exile woman named Gladys Perez, 27, who was arrested on Friday when she tried to force her way into the U. N. Building to "assassinate" Mr. Guevara with a hunting knife, attempted suicide by trying to slash her wrists with a hairpin. She was stopped, but she told Judge T. Vincent Quinn that she was raped and tortured in Castro's prisons and feared jail here.

A 17-year-old boy was also arrested yesterday for making threatening bomb calls to the U. N. during the past week. He was picked up at 9:30 a. m. after police managed to trace the last of his five or six calls.

Inside the U. N. several diplomats made angry noises about the protection afforded by the New York police, but none of them were expected to lodge formal protests or press the security issue in open session. For the complete background story, see Page 16.
