Some time ago, Robert SMALIS, a colored member of the State Sonate of South Carolina, was convicted by a South-Carolina court of malfessance in his official capacity, and the prospect was that he was a candilate for a term in the peniteriary. While these proceedings were peniing, or perhaps before they were instituted, SMALIS was elected a member of Congress from the Fifth South Carolina district, and there were member of Caggress from the Fifth South Carolina district, and there were suspicious, if not positive evidence, that he was the victum of unjust persecution, instigated by political jealousy and partisan proscription. The matter has recently been brought to the notice of the United States Supreme Court, on a petition for a writ of error, which writ has tion for a writ of error, which writ has just been granted by Chief Justice Warre, and the proceedings of the State court will be revised by the United States circuit court, where an impartial and unprejudited hearing will be accorded the defendant, and there is not much doubt but he will be rightfully acquitted. His congressional term closes on the fourth of March next, so that he will hardly have a chance to stand in his place and act free from the imputation of a criminal violator ollaw however; innoceat he may be of the
