

A DEVOTED SERVANT.

The Express relates an incident of the battle of Saturday last which illustrates the devotion of the negro to his master—one who, in showing this devotion, lost his life. He followed his master, a gallant young officer of Gen. Gordon's corps, into the fight, and remained near his person during the battle, to render any and every assistance in his power in case he was wounded. His anxiety about his master swallowed up all apprehension about his own safety. On the retreat, this faithful negro was shot through the head and instantly killed, and his master mourned his loss as that of a true friend.
