

MILTON, Aug., 1845.

Dear Sir,—As those better able to give you an account of the celebration held in our town have neglected to do so, I will undertake to tell you what a very good time we had. About half past eleven the meeting was called to order and a prayer was delivered by Rev E Otheman, of Milton, after which a Liberty song was sung by some of the true-hearted and sweet-voiced ladies of Milton. H. B. Stanton, Esq. then addressed the meeting in one of those eloquent and intellectual efforts by which he has served the slave so often and so well. In the course of the address he gave the history of the West India emancipation.

Lewis Clarke of Kentucky, then took the desk, and gave a spirited account of some of his own adventures, which occupied the meeting until the time of adjournment for the collation. Of the collation it is only necessary to say that there was an abundance of every thing, and that the usual number of chickens were added to the army of martyrs that have suffered in the cause of universal freedom.

In the afternoon the meeting was addressed by Rev. J. C. Lovejoy, of Cambridgeport, in one of the most elegant and convincing speeches we ever had the pleasure of listening to. Lewis Clarke then told some excellent Kentucky stories, and among other good things, begged of us to be enough of Abolitionists not to have to tell our neighbors of it.

There was good singing at every convenient time, both by some ladies and gentlemen of Milton, and Mr Penniman of Weymouth. Mr. Penniman bids fair to rival G. W. Clark, with practice.

This was the first Liberty celebration held in Milton, and although it was not as crowded as we trust the next will be, yet it served to help and cheer many of us, and we have the satisfaction of knowing that there were some people present, both from the free and the slave States, who were never in a meeting of the kind in their lives before.

Very sincerely.

X.
